From the Chiesco Journal, Jan. 4.]
Gounod's opera filled the house to repletion with a splendly audience last evendug. As in Martha, the choral and orchestral effects, so superbly brought out, added immensely to the speneral effect, and gave us Faust as we never had it before. The interest centres in Hermans' Mephiatopheles. It is a wonderful rendition, and the only way to describe it is by the use of superlatives. In the beneral make up, in facial contortion, the long, stiffened fingers, the gait—now glitting, now shuffling, at one time crouching, at another towering colorably—in the leer of devillah satisfaction, and in the grim and fendish chuckle there was nething human. It was the counterpart of the flend himself overshadowing and dwarfing everything else, and holding the attention of the auditor from the first set to finale. As a dramatic rendition we have never seen it equalled. But it is not alone dramagically that Hermans events. Vecally he is an equal prodige. His voice is a basso profund of immense volume and strength, freeh and execution. The trills in the lower register were as accurately, roundly and finely ions as ever sogrand schieved in the herman exceed with applaune, which of the new every tempests of enthusiasm.
